Comments

“ John was one of the nicest individuals I have ever worked with. He was clearly a top expert in his field and in high demand, yet he always seemed to have time to return my calls and lend assistance.

I will truly miss his friendly voice and expert advice.

“ John will be so very missed by all of us who worked with him. He was full of life and energy, especially in the morning. He would get to the site early and would be climbing a glide slope tower before most of us would wipe the sleep out of our eyes. John was recognized as an expert in the field of navigation and he was that and much more. He was eager to teach those of us who knew about 1% of what he knew about ILS. He enjoyed his work and would always want to get a photo of the team he was working with. I guess that showed that he valued the relationships he had with his coworkers all over the country. He liked to visit our site in Atlantic City, mostly because he could spend time with his son in Philadelphia. I know that he was a religious man and have faith that he is in a better place. I am certainly better off having known him. My deepest sympathies to John's family and friends.

“ Words alone cannot express how sorry I am to hear the shocking news about John. Please accept my condolences. May you find peace with the passing of time. As we work through the tears, pain and grief of the sudden loss of a loved one, it is good to remember that there is much rejoicing and many happy reunions in heaven. Praying for great comfort, peace and healing for your family, friends and everyone who was fortunate enough to know John.

“Love was a sacred garment. Woven of a fabric so thin that it could not be seen yet so strong that even mighty death could not tear it. A garment that could not be frayed with use that brought warmth into what otherwise would be an intolerably cold world. But at times love could also be as heavy as chain mail. Bearing the burden of love on those occasions when it was a solemn weight, made it more precious when in better times it caught the wind in sleeves like wings and lifted you.” - Dean Koontz

God bless you,
